THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 27.

THE JAPANESE QUACK DOCTOR .- He may not be a nomad, or he may; most often he is. The quack doctor who is not in the streets, but is consulted and prescribes at his own house, has been, at some time crother, an ambulant humbug. Some of them travel the length of the land, for their impostures are often so palpable that subsequent recognition might prooure for them something more than a rough reception. There was one Dector Desaburo, who regularly attended the great fair at Uweno, near Yedo, under different disguises. Once he had actually the impudence to assume musraches and whiskers, put on a second hand black dress suit, speak with a foreign accept, and pass for a distinguished English medicine man. The quack trades almost entirely with the lower classes. He must be of imposing aspect and carefully or fantastically dressed, for none are seen believers that "apparel of doth proclaim the man" as the Japanese. On a table in front of him stand bottles, and packets, and trays of every sert of known medical subbish One day Desabure ran short of gigger candy-his favorite remedy for indigestion-but was quite equal to the emergency, for he prescribed toothache remedies, sparm cures, ague and fever antidotes instead, with perfect splome and to whom at one time he had given the candy and at another the lever cooling medicine, without any care of the indigestion, attacked him with a stout bamboo, and so belabored him that he was glad to escape with his life, leaving his stuff to the mercy of an angry crowd. A mother, whose son he had nearly killed by an overdose of opium sedative, was for expecing him at law, but he compounded for the little error somehow. However, his success completely overbalanced these little difficulties, and he made a hear of money. His specially was conmade a heap of money. His specialty was a pow-der, which should cure any ailment, from old age to a toothache. This he told in gorgeous hoxes to an enormous extent, coattering volubly and blowing his own trumpet voeifercusly as he packed up and distributed the bix 38.
